Surprise Farm Notes.

The following is a short editorial from the Rural New Yorker. Every man who makes changes in crops or methods knows that he must go outside of his own farm for information. He must learn from others. The changes that take place in agriculture are usually the result of "book farming." Some man reads about what is being done in another part of the country and does his best to adapt the new method. At last he succeeds and the neighbors finally follow him and among them the new crop or method is developed. Thus these new ideas get into books and papers and jump about the country very much as birds carry new seeds or insects from place to place. Every farmer must do more or less of this book farming if he expects to keep up with the procession. If he doesn't take a little something for granted and venture a little on the advice of others he will fall the crowd. A farm is like a book, you have to study it to know what is in it. It takes time to learn what crops to raise, and where and how to raise them. There are no two farms just alike. Some call themselves good farmers because they can plow or do other mechanical farm work well. These things are important but unless each man carefully studies his own book the highest success cannot be gained. There you have it from the best farm walters in this country. If we succeed in farming we must study our business. It won't do to spend our spare times studying law or politics or this, and that and the other thing. Of course we all want to be posted on the current events of the day and study their influence on the markets, this is alright but when we plan and figure it all out just what the next move should be sign the Spaniard or whether McKinley should sign a bill or not it is going too far. It is wasting time that should be spent by the farmer in studying the management of his farm. There are brains enough on the farms in this country. All the trouble is a large part of their energy is spent in trying to show other people how to tend to their business. We must study our own business. THEODORE J. SPRAGUE.

FALSE PRETENSES.

Or Love's Sad, Short Dream and the Tragic

It was the last great game of the season. Every previous contest seemed to have been fought but for the greater glory of this. The wonderful contest of muscle and energy, brains and pluck, was in itself a mighty climax. The rhetoric professor himself was heard to remark that the half back had never made such a brilliant recitation.

Although the game had been over for half an hour numbers of the huge multitude continued on the field. Suddenly a loud shout resounded over the famed arena. "The victors are returning!" In the front rank was he, the Apollo, the Achilles, of the throng. He stood upon the gridiron, smiling, serene, confident, while cheer upon cheer rent the air. Not a scar was upon his ruddy cheek. Not a tangle in the raven hair that curled above his marble brow. How often had those broad shoulders bucked the line! How many times perchance had he gone around the ends, and with a brilliant genius touched the goal!

No wonder, then, that the fair maiden who beheld this scene of his triumph lost her heart. She waved her dainty, scented handkerchief. It fluttered from her grasp. He picked it up, and in a week they were engaged.

Nay, scarce any time elapsed before the knot was tied. "Ah, my beloved," she whispered, "how proud is my heart of you! What ineffable delight to look on your long flowing hair and think of your football triumphs."

"Football," he cried. "Did you say football?"

"Yes. Do you not remember it was upon that day I fell in love with you?" For a moment he gazed mournfully at her.

"Alas, you have made a mistake! It is not hair that makes the player. I am only a poet."

Ah, it was sad to look into her cold, glassy eyes.—San Francisco Examiner.

It Went.

Two Englishmen who were recently guests of Admiral Kirkland at the Mare Island navy yard were halted one evening by a sentry on their return to quarters.

The password that night was "Idaho," but the visitors had neglected to post themselves on this point. So they were at a loss when the magic word was demanded.

"What's the countersign?" repeated the sentry.

"I dunno," admitted one of the Londoners hopelessly.

"Proceed," said the condescending marine, who thought the admission sounded like "Idaho."—New York Tribune.
