Short Length of 'Ballerina' Skirt Offers New Style Trend

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

lerina" influence scen in dressy frocks for "noon to midnight" wear. This flattering mode has been appearing lately in stunning street and midcalf lengths styled entrancingly for both afternoon and evening wear.

The degree of formality of these festive frocks which are so charming for daylight dancing and evening party wear depends upon their styling and upon the type of fabric used. Emphasis on luxurious weave is the rule. Your new ballerina frock may be crisp and perky in checked rayon taffeta (a newly important fabric), or it may be ethereal and fairylike in misty rayon mousseline or in such glamorous rayon fabrics as handsome faille, or filmy marquisette with very special emphasis on the importance of black sheers and laces.

These daylight dancing dresses are at their height of glory for immediate wear. They will be helping to bid farewell this summer to skirts using yards and yards of material. The new fabric conservation program begins with fall and winter clothes. It is interesting to note that in the models pictured in the above illustration the silhouette is faithful to the original ballet inspiration in bodice as well as hemline. Necklines re flatteringly low in cut and are likely to be squared, heartshaped or slashed in a deep plunging V-shape. In sleeve lengths you will find every type from brief shoulder caps to wrist length, fitted or bishop styles. Shown to the left in the above illustration is a daytime-length version of the smart ballerina frock fashioned of fine rayon faille in a flattering shade of "plantation" green with a graceful overskirt of exquisite rayon lace in matching color. The fitted bodice, with its long-torso style and becoming V-neck, is typically "ballerina."

A charming multicolor floral cutout design of the flower print of the softly draped rayon crepe bodice is repeated in applique on the filmy rayon marquisette skirt of the enchanting midcalf-length ballerina frock designed for gala evenings shown centered in the illustration.

Pictured to the right is a dramatic interpretation of the midcalf frock for dining and dancing that uses ro-mantic black rayon lace with un-expected and very effective ruffled cuffs of snowy marquisette at the wrist. A black rayon taffeta slip adds crispness to the full flare of the skirt. It is dresses of the type of this black beauty that will be worn by guests attending fashionable weddings this summer. Huge-brimmed hats, also in black, will top these adorable lacy sheer black frocks. Pompadour versions of petite flowery bonnets misted in beguiling colorful veils will also be popular.

From all indications the "pretty" black frock is destined to triumph anew this summer. These sheers will practice their "black magic" in beguiling feminine versions dramatized with tiered skirts, detachable apron fronts, transparent yokes and fringe and lace trims, to which will be added delectable pastel or vivid color accents. No smart summer wardrobe will be complete without at least one of these black frocks of fragile beauty.

The new "black" vogue is also evidenced in stunning suits softly tailored of handsome faille or moire. For the most part these suits subscribe to the new slim short silhouette that is making conversation these days.

(Released by Western Newspaper Union.)

Hand-Crocheted

This flattering brim and beguiling mesh scarf look as if they had just left the workrooms of an expensive designer, but you can crochet them for yourself. The brim looks like straw, but it is actually cotton crochet treated with a starch solution. The fish net open mesh as seen in the scarf has become a hobby with fashion. It is used for the making of the now-so-fashionable fancy snoods in which young girls are so prettily caging their curls. It is stretched over linen handbags. The newest idea is to top your summer blouse with a fishnet sleeveless bodice. For a dramatic note for simple summer frocks, the hand-crocheted, scarfed wide-brim hat as here shown is just about 100 per cent perfect. Part of looking your best this summer will be keeping yourself looking fresh and cool and, even after hours at work, as crisp as a lady of leisure.

Bathing Suits Are Draped and Ruffled

You may swim this season in a softly draped and molded-to-the figure dressmaker suit styled of fine rayon crepe or sleek rayon jersey Or you can be gaily outfitted in a trim bare-midriff halter and shorts costume of sprightly acetate rayor

You'll see "little girl" ruffled suits in crisp rayon taffeta, as well as beautifully tailored princess styles in rich rayon materials. The new failles and shantungs offer a lovely range of brilliant or dusky colors.

Black play and swim clothes are given drama with vivid color touches and accessories. The dressmaker influence is very much in evidence.

Casual Dresses Designed

For Stay-at-Home Life No more long drives in the car. So we will have a new program of "stay-at-home" entertainment. Already invitations are being sent out to "come and enjoy yourself" at a backyard barbecue party or picnic. Of course you will want to dress to the occasion, which will mean picturesque, young and refreshing cottons done in rustic style. For these, gingham, flowery chintzes, chambrays, mattress ticking stripes and an endless list of sturdy cottons will fit picturesquely into the scene.

Glass Jewelry Jewelry, as well as handbag and shoe ornaments, is being made of colorful glass. Flower motifs in jewelry are favorites. You can get earrings, bracelets and clips to match. Very lovely necklaces cluster flowers about the throat. The colorings are superb in these attractive glass "jewels."

Horse Is Important Source of War Power

Tips Are Given for Better Care of Helpful Animal

By J. L. EDMONDS

(Professor of Horse Husbandry, University of Illinois College of Agriculture.)

With horses being a more important source of farm power than in many years, here are some tips on making the horse a more reliable and cheaper source of farm power.

1. Use a variety of feeds to fill all the requirements of a rationnutrients of the proper amount and proportions, bulk enough for safety in digestion and a high degree of palatability.

2. Feed according to individual needs. Horses probably vary more than other farm stock in individual feed requirements. Feed according to the job. Failure to adjust feed to the work being done causes the waste of much feed and occasionly results in the loss of good horses.

4. Use only feeds of good quality. Horses may safely eat considerable quantities of cheap, coarse, rough feed if it is wholesome.

5. Be punctual about feeding times. The horse is a creature of habit and shows his appreciation of punctuality, regularity and cleanliness in feeding by increased thrift. 6. Home-grown rations are usually cheapest. Very satisfactory rations may be composed entirely or almost entirely of home-grown feeds. 7. The weight of the horse and the presence or lack of thrift and spirit are tests of the adequateness of a ration. Horses at severe work usually do not need more than a pound of hay daily for each 100 pounds they weigh, but the grain weight. 8. Frequent watering and regular salting are very essential in hot ration should be approximately 11/4 pounds daily for each 100 pounds

9. Parasites of the digestive tract are best treated by an experienced veterinarian. Many farm colts and horses are too heavily parasitized to respond to good care.

10. Start horses to work gradually while the weather is still cool. Be a good horseman. Groom horses regularly.

11. Trim and level feet regularly. This may be done with regulation horseshoer's tools.

Hints on Farm Buildings

Farm buildings supported on wood posts frequently settle because of decay or the work of termites. Uneven settlement often is the cause of damage to wood framing. To prevent uneven settling of farm buildings supported on wood posts, engineers of the U.S. department of agriculture suggest that the posts be treated against rot and insects and set on masonry footings-either stone slabs or concrete—below the frost line. Posts used in repair of buildings should also be treated and set on

In jacking up a plastered farm building that has settled unevenly, engineers of the U.S. depart ment of agriculture suggest that the jacking be very gradual and uniform to prevent the walls from cracking.

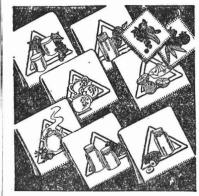

Building foundations that slope with a hillside are likely to shift, say engineers of the U.S. department of agriculture. Movement can be stopped by under-pinning so that the new footings are horizontal, like steps. These should extend below the frost line.

Increase of Dairy Cows

The number of dairy cows in Ohio and in the United States increased 3 per cent in 1941, and the number of dairy calves and heifers was the largest on record. The increase in cow numbers in 1942 probably will exceed the 1941 increase.

Cheap garden, field, or lawn seeds usually are the most expensive that can be purchased. Low germination weed contamination, and dirt are the three chief factors that make some seed sell for less.

By VIC YARDMAN (Associated Newspapers—WNU Service.)

HE first thing that made Norma angry was her inability to find the right trail leading back to the ranch. Secondly, the handsome, bronzed cowboy who was descending the slope, ostensibly to rescue her, was Fletcher Carey. She hated Fletcher Carey because he was so good-natured and popular and likeable, yet so wholly indifferent, because she was so free and easy with all the other cowboys on the ranch. She was, he thought, not decent.

She wondered how Fletcher Carey would have acted if he but knew her apparent free and easy attitude toward the other cowboys was merely a means of taunt, an assertion of independence and lack of interest at what Fletcher Carey thought of Thirdly, Norma was angry because of her present helplessness; because it was fast growing dark and she was afraid and she'd have to depend upon Fletcher Carey to bring her safely back to the ranch. This third reason for her anger fairly made her boil inside. It was going to be difficult, having to depend on a man she hated.

Fletcher Carey came loping along the trail, sitting on his horse in that casual western fashion that is the very personification of grace, and grinned at her. Actually grinned. Norma's face flamed.

"Hello," he said innocently, bringing his black horse to a halt. "Lost?" Norma glared at him icily. "No," she said, her words dripping with sarcasm. "I have a date with

"I-I guess I'll ride, if you don't mind." She looked up at him.

the big bad wolf. He's due any Fletcher Carey arched his brows in the faintest of surprise gestures. "Oh," he said. "Well, well. Forgive my curiosity." He made a clucking sound with his tongue and the black moved ahead.

Norma waited, without looking around. She felt sure he'd come back. He'd never dare to leave her alone out here. Why, even a stupid cowboy like Fletcher Carey must have known she was kidding. Perhaps the idiot had misinterpreted her wisecrack. Perhaps he thought by "big bad wolf" she'd meant one of the ranch cowboys.

Impulsively Norma turned and rode down the trail in the direction taken by Fletcher Carey. She rode slowly at first, half expecting to meet him coming back. But she didn't, and it was growing dark, rapidly. Somewhere up on the slope of the mountain a bobcat howled, and a little shiver ran down her spine. She touched spurs to her horse's flank, and the animal leaped ahead. And all the while Norma was fairly boiling inside. Of all the rude, ignorant, conceited men she'd had the ill fortune to meet, Fletcher Carey sure took the prize. She'd see that he lost his job for this. Then, bitterly, she remembered that he owned a half interest in the Double 6, and it would be rather difficult getting him fired.

Something stirred in the bushes beside the trail. Her horse shied, nearly upsetting her, and went racing down the trail. Norma's heart began to thump. They entered a grove of evergreens, which shut out the last remaining vestige of daylight. Ahead there was nothing but black stillness.

Suddenly the horse stopped short, and Norma went sliding up around its neck. She pushed herself back and clucked frantically, digging in her spurs. Something swept past her head. She sensed, rather than felt its presence, and her breath

In the next instant her horse was rearing on its hind legs, striking out in the dark. The air was suddenly filled with a strange, unpleasant odor. She went hurtling into space, struck with a sickening thud—then a gray curtain of nothingness closed about her . . .

When Norma opened her eyes she was lying on a bed of fir boughs. There was a fire a few feet away over which a man was stooped, lay ing sticks on crosswise. She sat up with a start, remembering. The man turned and grinned.

"Remember "Hello," he said. me?"

"I remember everything but you," said Norma, self-possessed once ways.

more now that Fletcher Carey was there to protect her. "What happened?"

"Your horse shied at a skunk and threw you. Pesky things, skunks." "I can agree with that," said Norma meaningly, and immediately hoped he wouldn't get her point.

"There was something overhead."
"An owl," said Fletcher Carey.
He came and sat down beside her. Your horse went back to the ranch. We'll have to ride double."

"I'd rather walk," Norma said coldly.

Fletcher Carey shrugged. "Suit yourself." He stood up and moved off in the darkness. "Douse the fire before leaving," he called.

Norma got to her feet in a hurry.
"Oh! — Wait! — Mr. Carey!" She started running, frantically, and almost collided with Fletcher Carey coming back. "Whoa!" he grinned. "You'd better not start by running. It's a long ways."

"I-I guess I'll ride, if you don't mind." She looked up at him, meekly, almost cringing, fear of the dark in her yes. The grin vanished from Fletcher Carey's lips.

"Sure," he said. "Wait here."
He went away again. Norma watched the spot where he disappeared until he came into the light, leading his black. "Up you go," he said cupping his hands.

When he went to douse the fire, she had an impulsive desire to strike the black smartly and race off, leaving him there. But she didn't. She waited, and Fletcher swung up behind her, grinning once more, and they started ahead.

He guided the black, with his arms about her waist, which made her resentful at first, and later sent a little tingle of pleasure coursing through her veins. Suddenly she was regretful for everything; she wanted to be friends, wanted to know the man better. She wanted to tell him so, but her pride suppressed the longing.

And so they rode along in silence. Norma leaned against him, feeling safe and protected and curiously happy. His voice, coming out of the blackness, startled her. Fletcher Carey said:

"I guess I've treated you pretty mean. I'm sorry. We don't ordi-narily treat our guests like this. But -with you-it was different."

"Different?" she asked, her heart beginning to pound.

"I fell in love with you—a month ago." His voice was apologetic. "Sorry. Didn't mean to. Just one of those things. Figured you had no use for me, so I steered clear. Kinda got under my skin, the way you played around with the hands." He paused. "Fact is, I been follow-ing you all afternoon. Hoped you'd get lost so's I could have this chance. Sorry now, though."

Norma felt the tenseness of his body. His tone was casual, but she knew it had taken an effort to speak at all. And it wasn't because she was a guest either. The Double 6 had a waiting list. It was—it must

Suddenly she laughed, a little silvery laugh—contented, happy. "Fact is, cowboy," she said, trying to sound as casual as he, "I knew you were following me, and got lost on purpose."

The black stopped, then went ahead again. Its reins hung loose, but the lights of the ranch house showed ahead and the animal was

'Kathleen' a Kentuckian,

Not From 'Green Island' Despite the fact that the song, 'I'll Take You Home Again Kathleen," tells of a home "across the ocean wild and wide," the fact is that it was written by a native of Virginia, Thomas Paine Westendorf.

"In the fall of 1875," states James J. Geller in "Famous Songs and Their Stories," "he (Westendorf) and his family were residing in Louisville, Ky., but the sudden death of a son brought illness to Mrs. Westendorf and caused her physician to prescribe a change in surroundings.

"While reading to her one evening, Westendorf suddenly laid down his book and both began to discuss their future plans. His wife indicated a desire to join her mother in New York, but dreaded the long winter journey and the husband tenderly promised to accompany her there in the spring. Having thus assured her, he continued with his book until she retired for the night. In the stillness of the following hours, Westendorf began slowly to improvise at random on the piano. Suddenly his eye lit upon a frayed copy of an old composition written by one George Parsely and titled, 'Barney, I'll Take You Home Again.' The title of this song yielded the very sentiment and thought talked over earlier in the evening. In an hour he had written the words and music of 'I'll Take You Home Again, Kathleen.'

. . The new ballad went off to a Cincinnati publisher . . . Westendorf's song was introduced in Macaulay's theater in Louisville at a benefit for a Catholic church by a local tenor singer. The words and sentiment of the ballad revived fond memories of the Emerald Isle in most of the parishioners, who were of Irish extraction, and their countrymen soon adopted 'I'll Take You Home Again Kathleen.'"

Man Hunted for 15 Years Is 'Glad' To Stand Trial

Modern Jean Valjean, Under Indictment for Murder, Gives Self Up.

NORWALK, OHIO. — Charles Mitchell, alias Colergo Micciuli, has decided that a man just can't live with a troubled conscience.

This modern Jean Valjean, under an indictment for first-degree murder for 15 years, voluntarily surrendered to authorities recently in order, he said, to stand trial and clear his name in the fatal shooting of Mrs. John Rupino at nearby Bellevue on Christmas day, 1926.

Mitchell, a former railway section worker and resident of Bellevue at the time of the shooting, visited relatives in that city recently and while there gave himself up to K. P. Fox, Bellevue lawyer.
Fox brought Mitchell to Norwalk where the latter pleaded not guilty when arraigned before Common Pleas Judge Edgar G. Martin.

Almost Forgotten.

The case had been almost forgotten by the residents of Bellevue, city of 6,100 on the Huron-Sandusky county line west of here, when Mitchell surrendered after his long torment of conscience.

Records disclosed that the shooting followed a series of quarrels. Officials, declared that Mitchell, along with Mr. and Mrs. John Rupino and others, were guests at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Biaggio Castrovino on the evening before Christmas, 1926. It was at this time that bitter words were heard.

On the following day, Mitchell, intending to apologize for what he had said in the altercation, went to the Rupino home, according to his account. His good will call led to another quarrel and a fight, in which he asserted that he was knocked down and given a black eye.

He then left the house but later returned; the argument was resumed, a gun was drawn and three bullets struck Mrs. Rupino. She died a week later in Bellevue hos-

His Version Different.

Mitchell was accused of carrying a gun and firing the fatal shots but his version of the story was that Mrs. Rupino threatened him with the revolver and that she was shot in the struggle when he tried to wrest it from her grasp.

A Huron county grand jury returned a first-degree murder indictment against Mitchell and county commissioners later posted a $200 reward for his capture.

The prosecutor in charge of the grand jury at the time of Mitchell's indictment was E. G. Martin, the judge before whom he was arraigned.

In his cell in the Huron county jail, Mitchell appeared to be more relieved than apprehensive at the prospect of going on trial.

He admitted that, after 15 years as a fugitive, he was glad of the opportunity to get the case cleared up and said he was confident he would win acquittal. Mitchell, a small man, weighing about 130 pounds, is 55. After the shooting, he said, he roamed about Ohio, doing odd jobs for a few years, finally coming to a stop in Youngstown several years ago after getting a job in a dry cleaning establishment. In that time he never had met any former friends or associates he had known in Bellevue.

TFRENCE'S FAREWELL

So, my Kathleen, you're going to leave All alone by myself in this place,

But I'm sure you will never deceive On no. if there's truth in that face. 'hough England's a beautiful city,

Full of illigant boys, oh what then-You wouldn't forget your poor Ter ence,

You'll come back to ould Ireland a gain? Och, those English! deceivers by na ture. Though maybe you'd think them sincere;

They'll say you're a sweet charming creature,

But don't you believe them, my dear. No, Kathleen, my love, don't be mind-The flattering speeches they'll make fust fell them a poor boy in Ireland Is breaking his heart for your sake. It's a folly to keep you from going, Though, faith, it's a mighty hard case---For, Kathleen, you know, there's no knowing When next I shall see your sweet

And when you come back to me, Kathleen. None the better will I be off, then-You'll be spaking such beautiful Eng-Sure, I won't know my Kathleen again. Eh, now, where's the need of this hurry-

Don't flutter me so in this way--'ve fongot, 'twixt the grief and the

Every word I was maning to say; Now just wait a minute, I bid ye— Can I talk if ye bother me so? Oh, Kathleen, my blessing go wid ye, Ev'ry inch of the way that you go.

Yes, Uncle Sam wants you to eat healthfully in these times. In fact, it is the duty of everyone to do so. It is a simple matter.

The meats and vegetables you buy contain many necessary vitamins and minerals.

You must cook those foods properly, though,

or you will waste valuable elements. Cook them carefully with the controlled heat of your electric range. Don't boil the vitamins out and pour them down the sink. Use low-temperature cooking. Your electric range provides for it.
