

A young fellow, of Eagle River, Wis., by the name of Frank Falter, and Blanche Young, of Mich., became acquainted through an advertisement and after a brief correspondence exchanged pictures and last week were to meet in Chicago and get married. They missed each other by a few moments and in this way the matter become known and by the help of Chicago people, who took pains to find out who Falter was (and it was ascertained that he was a commendable young man) they were brought together and as the young lady was only sixteen years old and had ran away from home, by telegraphing and acquainting her parents with everything and the character of the young man, they finally gave their consent. They were married on Saturday, and nearly every reading person in the U. S. was interested in the affair.
