Gentlemen:

We have returned most of the 500 books which we borrowed from your library for the summer and are now mailing the last stray which found its way out from under somebody's bed after school started.

One of the books which we returned - EFFELI by Austin - parted company from its cover while we had it. It was very popular among the little children.

The collection was very well chosen and much appreciated and greatly used by the children of the village. The Eagle PTO would like to express their appreciation for this service which the state offers to us. Having it here for the summer pretty well answered the question of whether anyone would use a library should the village decide to establish one.

Since starting any sort of adequate library from nothing would be a very expensive procedure, are there any borrowing plans by which a local library could borrow from the state in order to supplement a small collection until it got to be an adequate size?

Does the state offer any advice to a group of amateurs on the starting of a village library?

Sincerely

LaVerne Mann
